

Apple has done it again! Like many multinationals, it has not let human rights get in the way of potential profits from the huge Chinese market.

The Epoch Times reports that the strict regime of Internet censorship and surveillance enforced by the Chinese authorities drives many Internet users to seek out tools they can use to get around the restrictions — programs like OpenDoor, a browser that was available recently from the App Store in China.

Until Apple removed it.

Read full story here